Observation

2000 Year as highest Rating

1 Analysis

1.1 Sparsity:

- Sparsity: 95.53%
- Interpretation: The dataset is highly sparse, with only about 4.47% of the possible user-movie pairs having ratings.

1.2 Use Case:

- Goal 1: Recommend new movies to users.
  - Recommendation: Item-based collaborative filtering might be more effective because it focuses on similarities between movies.
- Goal 2: Personalize recommendations based on user behavior.
  - Recommendation: User-based collaborative filtering could be useful, but the high sparsity might make it less reliable.

2 Decision

Given the dataset characteristics:

2.1 High Sparsity (95.53%):

- Preference: Item-based collaborative filtering tends to perform better in sparse datasets because item similarities are more stable than user similarities.

2.2 Number of Users > Number of Movies:

- Observation: While the number of users is larger than the number of movies, the difference is not extreme. However, item-based filtering is still preferred due to the high sparsity.

2.3 Use Case:

- Goal: Recommend movies (items).
  - Recommendation: Item-based filtering is more suitable.

2.4 Why Item-Based Collaborative Filtering?

2.4.1 Stability:

- Reason: Item similarities are less affected by sparsity compared to user similarities.
- Observation: Movies tend to have more consistent ratings over time, while user preferences can change frequently.

2.4.2 Scalability:

- Reason: With 3,706 movies, computing item similarities is computationally efficient.
- Comparison: User-based filtering would require computing similarities between 6,040 users, which is more computationally expensive.

2.4.3 Performance:

- Reason: Item-based filtering often performs better in sparse datasets because it relies on fewer, more reliable relationships (item-item similarities).
